Centenarians’ End-of-Life Thoughts: Is Their Social Network Informed?

Release Date:
Wednesday, May 23, 2018 2:32 am EDT

Terms:

Dateline City:
Hoboken, NJ

Contacts:
Penny Smith +44 (0) 1243 770448 sciencenewsroom@wiley.com

People in centenarians’ close social networks are often not aware of their thoughts on end-of-life issues, a new Journal of the American Geriatrics Society study reveals.

In the study of 78 centenarians and their primary contacts (proxies), proxies misjudged whether the centenarian thought about end of life in nearly half of cases. Although only few centenarians perceived the end of life as threatening, and approximately one-quarter reported longing for death, proxies overestimated centenarians’ reports on the former and underestimated the latter. Proxies reported more centenarian end-of-life planning than centenarians themselves.

“Our findings suggest a lack of communication about end of life between centenarians and the people they count on most,” said lead author Dr. Kathrin Boerner, of the McCormack Graduate School of Policy and Global Studies at the University of Massachusetts Boston. “Healthcare professionals should be aware that even among very old adults, discussions about end of life wishes need to be actively encouraged.”

Additional Information
Twitter: @gerontologyumb
Image - photo credit rs-fotoart
Graphic – credit Dr. Boerner

About Journal
Included in more than 9,000 library collections around the world, JAGS is the go-to journal for clinical aging research. We provide a diverse, interprofessional community of healthcare professionals with the latest insights on geriatrics education, clinical practice, and public policy—all supporting the high-quality, person-centered care essential to our well-being as we age.

Language:
English